

FIGURE 13.1. Variability is necessary for evolution. The diagram shows a single ancestral species that splits into three present-day species (as indicated by the three branches). Evolution consists of the occasional origin of new alleles by mutation (red dots), followed by changes in their frequency in the population, represented here by different colors.